Photoshop 2020 also offers Focus Peaking, a new form of sharpening based on local image analysis. Focus Peaking analyzes edges to help bring out high-contrast details in closely focused areas of the image no matter what background lighting you use. You can boost the sharpness of a lens-blurred image by selecting an area with a weak exposure and nudging the sliders. This method lets you get a good sense of the outcome, and a quicker overall workflow. While Photo Rescue is useful if you make a gross mistake—what if you automatically remove the tree from your home in the top third of the photo, for example?—it's not a replacement for a professional photo lab's automated system. Photo Rescue is meant to replace the laborious part of batch-processing photos and a convenient way to interact with your photo library when viewing in a browser. Metro users get a clean interface for zooming in on and out of photos. Navigation is a bit limited because the process is under way, but you can hold down the Alt key (Windows) or Option (Mac) to see a completed sidebar of your pictures and a progress display in the center of the browser window. The sidebar displays cute animations when you hover, allowing you to see detailed information about the photo. Another Firefox feature is Speed Search, a way to save both time and bandwidth by only loading pages that have thumbnail previews. "You won't have to wait for a page to load to see if it's something you want to click through to," Kivrak explains. When using Photoshop or the other Adobe apps, you can specify Speed Search settings. The more you turn it on, the more you slow down your connection. In basic operation, saving 5 kilobytes of data will speed up a typical connection by 200 milliseconds.
